5	High school completion rates correlate with earlier success which in turn correlate with preschool programs (both educational and social services), so improvements in early childhood should benefit children throughout their educations (and lives). As public high school completion rates are up by several points nationally, there are no doubt existing programs that could serve as models for improving completion rates in WWC. The poor completion rates for the Latino population suggests the need, in addition to other programs, for better inclusion initiatives, including perceptions that obtain in the Latino community about attitudes toward Latino students in some schools, such as CPHS. For post-secondary education, easier access is a great starting point. Although it is a state issue, I'll note free community college and technical education as a priority.	10/23/2018 10:54 AM
6	Encourage career fairs, improve outreach from WWCC to local high schools, complete job readiness and career strength tests for high school juniors and seniors, get the conversation started about education.	10/23/2018 6:49 AM

#	RESPONSES	DATE
1	Increase non-bullying campaigns beyond the school borders. Make it a community wide effort rather than just within the school walls.	10/23/2018 6:56 AM
2	Our schools need to ensure all school staff are trained and ready to intervene in bullying situations. Training must be ongoing and truly include every person working in the schools. Also, social emotional curriculum and programming must be implemented to fidelity consistently if it is to be effective. Half measures are leading to large numbers of children being bullied.	10/19/2018 9:45 AM
3	This is a behavior used to dominate and manipulate those individuals that are perceived to some how be weaker or different. I have noticed that some kids never bully or are bullied throughout their entire school phase-why is that? I believe they learn skills from their parents to deal with others.	10/19/2018 9:02 AM
